The watchman, named Howarth, declined to interfere, as the man was brutally drunk, and did not seem to understand what he was about. Shortly afterwards, Howarth was found sitting on the flags, holding his hand over a wound, from which his bowels protruded. He died the same evening. From his statement it appeared, that, after parting with the drunken man, he had proceeded to his beat; and, about a quarter past three o'clock, he was in Mason-street, when he saw the man coming towards him. Immediately on meeting each other, the fellow, without saying a single word, drew a carving knife, from under his coat, made a violent stab at the lower part of his abdomen, and ran away. Howarth immediately called for assistance, and other watchmen came up to him, but too late to secure the murderer. Of the persons who saw the man on that night, no one knew any thing at all about him. A reward was offered for his apprehension. Queen Op Portugal--On Sunday the 12th, the birth day of Don Pedro, at the residence of the marquis Palmella, above two hundred Portuguese swore the oath of allegiance to the young Queen Donna Maria, and recorded their attachment to the ordinances of the emperor Don Pedro, and to the charter which had been to them the source of bitter sufferings. The marquis de Palmella addressed his fellow-countrymen for three quarters of an hour, thanking them on the part of their sovereign and country, for the sacrifices which they had made in the cause of both. He made them fully acquainted with the views of the emperor Don Pedro, in the conditional abdication he had made of the Portuguese crown in favour of hi, eldest daughter--the condition being, the preservation of die char-, t...
