The advertisement which is prefixed to this volume will sufficiently explain the circumstances in which it originated. It is the good or bad fortune of a person in the position of the author to be unable to avail himself of that harmless artifice by which, under the guise of an apology, an attempt is sometimes made to disarm the inexorable critic. If a man has a right to disparage himself, he has certainly no right to disparage others, and if anything he has written is judged worthy of publication by those whose practical acquaintance with the subject to which it relates entitles their opinion to the utmost respect, it is at least his privilege to be silent. An opposite course, moreover, might easily be construed into an act of mock humility, or an ingenious attempt to exalt himself by an implied acquaintance with faults which such persons have either not perceived, or indulgently overlooked.
